

Regardless of whether large media conglomerates provide "better" programming, the new rules would certainly make it harder to find coverage of local issues and access to a range of local voices and viewpoints. Many such conglomerates as Fox and Clear Channel openly admit their content is a commodity and as such, pure information is pushed aside for only content that sells something. This is giving away the airwaves to corporate interests, and abandoning public interests, and yes, they are separate. I strongly oppose the new rules for these reasons.
